

Generator rear air leakage phenomenon

Overview

Your generator is likely leaking gas from the air filter due to a stuck carburetor float or a defective needle valve. Immediate attention is required to prevent further damage. A leaking generator can pose safety risks and affect. As a general rule, an improper seal between the float needle and the seat in the carburetor will cause the gasoline to keep filling up the carburetor bowl and eventually overflow up into the throat of the carburetor and out the air filter. This can be due to a deformity or tear in the rubber needle. Gas leaking from a generator's air filter is a common symptom that indicates underlying mechanical or maintenance issues. This problem not only affects generator performance but can also pose serious safety hazards such as fire risks and toxic fumes. The upside is that knowing why gasoline leaks happen can.
